Traditionally, the bedroom is known as the place to catch some zzz's (we're trying to keep it "PG" here, folks). With the dawn of the digital age, however, it's no longer just a room to unwind or send the kids to be punished; there are just too many tech distractions: TVs, gaming consoles, stereo systems, computers, and more.

That said, there's more you can do than just watch late-night TV or check your e-mail in the comfort of your bedroom. With the addition of these unusual tech products to the boudoir—a wrist band that relieves snoring and iPod-friendly sleepwear, for example—you may never want to leave your bedroom.

Here are a couple of the products you'll find in today's 10 Weird Tech Devices for Your Bedroom slideshow:

Snore Relief Wrist Band

Live with a snorer? We're sorry. Hopefully you can get a good night's rest by treating your bed mate to the Snore Relief Wrist Band. It consists of a microphone that can "discriminate between ambient noise...and snoring and uses electrical signals that gently stimulate the median nerves located at the inner wrists without waking you." A study of the device showed that 80 percent of the participants stopped snoring after two weeks of use. And, the device is also water-resistant. You know, in case you drool in your sleep. It operates on one AAA battery and sells for $79.95 at Hammacher.com.

Play Print iBoxers

Admit it: you prance around your bedroom in your boxers with a hairbrush in your hand, belting out Madonna's "Material Girl" in front of your mirror. Why not kick it up a notch of the ridiculous scale by sporting these iPod-friendly Print iBoxers from Play? Made of ribbed cotton and spandex, it features a small front pocket to tuck away your MP3 player or mobile phone while dancing around the bedroom. Available in pink or turquoise, sing in fashionable sleepwear for $19 each from FreshPair.com. And guys, you're not left out: Play also makes iBoxers for Men, priced at $22 each.
